Q: C#: why does this return a null array? I'm trying to return a list of customers from a controller action. This is my action: `public ActionResult AllCustomers() { var customers = Session["customers"] as List; if (customers != null) return View(customers); else return HttpNotFound(); }` No exceptions are thrown but I get null returned instead. I'm trying to access the Session attribute customer as shown in: `public class Customer { public string Name; public DateTime Created; }` What am I doing wrong? A: When your page first loads, the `Session["customers"]` is null. Your Session should be set before rendering the `AllCustomers` action What I did to debug is to return `View(1)` and then changing to `View(customers)` and you will see that in the debugger the customers are null. You need to refresh the Session to set the value before returning the `AllCustomers` action. Other than that, you can just write a nullable type if you want to handle null easily `public ActionResult AllCustomers() { if (Session["customers"] != null) { var customers = Session["customers"] as List; return View(customers); } else { return HttpNotFound(); } }` This is from a View Page using Razor syntax: `@foreach (var item in Model) { if (item != null) { @item.Name } }` EDIT If you want to avoid as and you want to just return an array, you can change your variable `var customers = (List)Session["customers"]; return View(customers);`

What's New in the Adobe Photoshop CS4?

The present invention relates generally to the field of signal processing of electromagnetic and sonic or acoustic radiation, and more particularly, to a system and method for processing signals for use in a PABX or speech path unit in a radiotelephone system. Standard EIA and TIA PABXs today handle a total of five user-to-user calls and seven user-to-machine calls over three frequency bands: from 800-900 MHz, from 900-1,050 MHz, and from 1,500-1,550 MHz. In the future, radiotelephones will be introduced and made commercially available which will require not only the same five user-to-user calls, but also two user-to-machine calls over the 800-900 MHz frequency band. Call blocking is a mechanism that will be used to prevent calls received on a radiotelephone from interfering with a user's conversation on the telephone network. For a radiotelephone to function in an emergency or call receiving system, it must first register or be present in the system. In this situation, call blocking would be used to prevent calls coming in from a radiotelephone, which the radiotelephone has not yet registered in, from interfering with a call in progress, even though the radiotelephone is still within the system. This requirement is a serious problem for standard PABXs. In today's PABXs, all three frequency bands described above are protected by a single SDC block, typically a 1011 block, and the radiotelephone must be in its SDC connected to a DTMF detector for detection of the initiation of a registration or activation request. One method for detecting radiotelephone call initiation is to use the radio telephone's RRC capabilities. However, this method is limited in that it can only detect the call initiation request coming from the radiotelephone, and not incoming callers. Additionally, the radiotelephone capability of RRC can only determine call initiation requests for other radiotelephones with which it has established an RRC call connection. Accordingly, the radiotelephone capability of RRC cannot be used to determine call initiation requests for other radiotelephones which are not associated with a call being in progress. Another method for detecting call initiation requests is to use a separate control line, such as a DTMF
